Lynne had to pull them out of their cages, especially Rascal. It seemed like the dogs didn't want to get out from the cage.	Once they got out, Lynne almost fell as the dogs pulled the leads. It was nice to get some fresh air.
When Lynne came in the next morning, it was even quieter than the day before. All these dogs that used to jump up at her now sat still in their cages.	Lynne had always loved dogs and was happy to help out at the Lazy Hound kennels for some work experience.
When they got closer to the kennel the dogs started to act crazy. Rascal turned and ran as fast as she could until her lead snapped tight.	It was dark. The humans had gone. The sound came back, the scary sound. Rascal didn't want to look but she had to.
Mrs Turner, the owner of the kennel, told them to take it easy with the dogs that day. They seemed to be very tired.	Rascal told the other dogs what she had heard when they had been out walking. She told them what they had to do.
Once they came out into the fields, the dogs began to act normally. Blakey sniffed everything and Rascal played with a stick.	Geoff, the vet, told them that it was a mystery. A dog that young usually didn't die from a weak heart. He shook Mrs Turners hand.
Lynne gave Rascal a hug and went into the shop to call the police.	Lynne couldn't get King out. The big black Rottweiler just sat there with his red rubber bone in his mouth.
Jackie went to King's cage. She started to clean it out, but there was something red under the straw. It was king's rubber bone, chewed to pieces.	Lynne opened the freezer and found more than dog food. Under there were dead dogs wrapped in black cloth.
That evening Lynne came back to the kennel. What had scared big King to death? She opened the door to the clinic room and went inside.	Jackie had to blow her nose twice when se was packing up King's stuff in a box for the owners.
Lynne opened Rascals cage. Rascal went to the freezer and began to howl. Lynne felt something through her.
