- Greta Thunberg joins Extinction Rebellion

Extinction Rebellion is a non-violent direct-action group. Direct-action means the group uses strikes, demonstrations and protests to achieve their demands.

Extinction Rebellion have been demonstrating in London, and across the country, since Monday 15th April. They're asking the UK government to do more to stop climate change. Protestors told Guardian News they're fighting for our planet:

Protester: We believe in fighting for our planet. We don't have long to make the changes that we need to.

The protests were designed to be peaceful but more than 1000 people were arrested.

16-year-old Swedish environmental activist, Greta Thunberg, visited London to join protesters. Greta spoke to a crowd gathered in the centre of London, taken from Channel 4 News:

Greta Thunberg: And we will never stop fighting. We will never stop fighting for this planet, and for ourselves, our futures and for the futures of our children and grandchildren. Thank you!

- And now, the teenagers who translate for their parents

Migrating to a new country has many challenges including learning a new language. These challenges are often easier for children than adults as they're able to go to school. This helps them quickly learn the language of their new home. But what happens to the parents? The BBC spoke to Bayan Alwadi about this:

Bayan Alwadi: My name is Bayan Alwadi, I am 14 years old, I come to here last year with my family. This is my mum, her name is Mouna Alwadi, I help her to learn English and she is so proud of me.

Bayan's mum depends on her daughter to teach her English and translate for her in different settings, including the doctor's office.

Bayan Alwadi: When she has an appointment at the doctors or the dentist or anything, I go there to help her because she doesn't know the language.

Mouna is one of 750,000 people in the UK who speak little English. Not speaking the language can be difficult in places like restaurants, shops and during medical appointments. The BBC visited one hospital in Peterborough to discover the challenges of translation

Administrator: Are you okay with English?

Patient: Russia

Administrator: Russian that's fine, zone B please

Patient: Thank you.

Administrator: You're welcome.

The surgery has had to recruit workers who speak more than 15 different languages. Dr Neil Modha explained:

Dr Neil Modha: Well, we have to completely change the way that we run our service.

- And finally, Avicii's new song SOS is released

Last year in April the famous Avicii – whose real name was Tim Bergling – committed suicide. Since then a team of writers and producers have been working on an album based on Avicii's work before he died.

Let's have a listen to the single SOS that was released last month:

*"I can feel your touch pickin' me up from the underground, and I don't need my drugs, we could be more than just part-time lovers
We could be more than just part-time lovers
We could be more than just part-time lovers"*

That's all for today. We'll be back again on the 18th May! Thanks for listening!
